In the London walk at 11 o'clock this morning Rowell had scored 72 miles, Weston 42. At 2:30 p. m. Rowell's score was 93, Weston 56. Weston has been sick from severe diarrhoea. Both are now going well.

Baltimore Arabs and Hawkers. The sounds of summer in the country have been celebrated by poets in all ages. The rustling trees, the "purling" brooks, —for brooks always purr except when they "babble"—the warbling of birds and the chirping of insects, these make up the music which man makes in all ages have professed to admire.

But in the summer the cry of the hawk bursts suddenly and like the spring flowers, through the open window he may be heard far up the street, making the wild music of negotiation.

Each trade or calling—if the word calling may be used in this connection—has its own note; a specific melody or cadence by which it may be recognized at a distance, that renders words unintelligible. Like the unlettered signs that can be read at vast distances, the barber's pole of colored stripes, the three balls of the armurer, the red and white bottles of the apothecary, or the red lamp that tells the remote wayfarer that the pangs of thirst may be thereabouts assuaged—these unwritten signs, visible at greater distances than worded signs, are like the cry of the hawk.

Some have fine sonorous vowels that ring out clearly. "H-a-g-s, b-o-o-n-e-s," leath a sound like a trumpet, the least so be can of the normal range of the voice acquire. The race character is often discernible. The gentleman who lends umbrellas may be known by a crisp pronunciation of the two "l" in umbrellas— as none but an Italian can. The person who reads notices of blisters, meaning may be guessed by a distance where words lose their articulate form. The tune gives their individuality.
